Understanding Our Young Former Catholics

PART TWO

In Part 1 of this series, I wrote concerning the results of a recent survey out of Notre Dame University regarding “Former Young Catholics,” young people who have left the Church.* As I mentioned, one of the first findings of the report is that former Catholic young adults still (mostly) believe in and interact with/pray to God. The implications are that the majority of former young Catholics are not moving toward atheism or agnosticism and that they are still open to some experience of the Divine. The challenge is to get them to want to come back so as to know and experience the Divine as God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Spirit in the faith of the Catholic Church. At least there is a starting point.

The second major finding was that “formerly Catholic emerging adults tend to be uncomfortable with firm statements about who or what God is. They like to keep such matters open-ended.” They are not alone in this way of thinking. It is generational: “... what works for one person might not work for someone else, and very few statements can or should be made about God, faith, and morality.” As one young man put it, “I’m so okay with the uncertainty. I think the most beautiful works of art are the ones that lead you to asking questions as opposed to those trying to supply answers to what something is.” Sounds like the Socratic method to me, the asking and answering of questions so as to draw out ideas and underlying presumptions. We also call it apologetics.

Implications and opportunity:

Within the Catholic tradition, theology is often defined as “faith seeking understanding.” If these young adults are people of “faith,” meaning they have some form of nascent or basic faith in the Divine or even in Jesus, then there is an opportunity here for us to engage them in a dialogue of faith and reason — faith seeking understanding. As stated in the report, “The effective formation of Catholic youth today need not obfuscate or compromise Church teachings, but will most likely best convey them in an open, confident, exploratory, and dialogic mode.”

In other words, a rote memorization of the truths of the Catholic faith is not going to do it. Explaining the whys or what of our faith, flowing out of our disciple relationship with Jesus, in a way that allows for open exploration of those truths, may lead to good results.

Yours in Christ,

Christopher J. Coyne

2017 BISHOP'S ANNUAL APPEAL REPORT

When the Bishop's Annual Appeal (then, the Bishop's Fund) began in 1958, it raised $250,000 to provide counseling services, assist Catholic schools, provide emergency aid, and support vocations. Today, the diocesan-wide appeal raises nearly $3M to sustain many of the same ministries supported over its 58-year history, but also an ever-expanding range of apostolates. Learn more about what the appeal supports today and give at bishopsappealvt.org.
